

ABSTRACT

A surface of a multicrystalline silicon substrate is etched with an alkaline aqueous solution in a condition so that a surface area-to-planar surface area ratio R is smaller than 1.1. A multiplicity of fine textures are formed over the irregularities by dry etching. This allows fine textures to be formed uniformly, and a solar cell with high efficiency can thus be produced.